The fool! exclaimed he. Why, its in the solemn plugginess of the mince pie that all the charm lies. o There are a lot of people with no poetry in their souls. How different to A. Sloper! A. Sloper is a child of nature, and, did his stamina allow of it, would live on flowers and scents, bask in the summer sunshine, listen to sweet music, and admire Lovely Women (from a poetical point of view, at a respectable distance). The other evening the spirit moved him to wander forth and cull roses. He got over the railings of one of the London squares and filled his hat and coat-tail pockets. It was his intention to take them home and deck his modest chamber with them. Some men care naught for these pure and chaste delights; it would have been infinite joy to him. A party, however, who said he was the keeper of the square, inquired what he was up to. A. Sloper told him simply, and offered him a rose to smell. He said, You dirty, idle, mendacious, thievish old scoundrel, Ive a good mind to kick you from here to Charing Cross; but, as it is, I shall only give you in charge, and you ll have a month certain. How little one is understood! This is the Poetical Sloper. For some time past, at a house of call Well. said Tubbs, if its coming out soon, and It...
